what once began as a satirical comment that churches resemble commercial enterprises has become an unsettling reality this perception has gained traction over the years especially with the rise of pentecostal and charismatic movements which have done little to counter the church's increasingly tarnished public image independent personality driven ministries have amplified this concern often structured like corporate fortune 500 entities these churches are typically led by a single figure founder general overseer or president and frequently resemble family run dynasties with leadership passed along bloodlines their unabashed promotion of the prosperity gospel and lack of restraint in matters of wealth and power have only fueled public skepticism a major area of concern is the popular narrative surrounding tithing and church finances since the 20th century charismatic churches have shaped the dominant view on this issue warranting careful scrutiny this book offers a critical forensic examination of that narrative which often rests on three pillars 1 using abraham's tithe to melchizedek as a precedent for christian giving 2 repeatedly citing malachi 3:8-12 to warn of divine curses for non-tithers and 3 highlighting personal testimonies of financial blessings linked to tithing it challenges the notion that new testament believers are bound by the abrahamic melchizedek example it also revisits old testament tithing commands originally given to national israel under the sinai covenant texts frequently ignored in modern preaching the book outlines three distinct types of old testament tithes the levitical tithes the festival tithes and the poor tithes and explores their relevance or lack thereof to the new testament church crucially it argues that the curse mentioned in malachi 3:9 is not applicable to new testament believers as it was tied to a covenant that has been superseded by the new covenant in christ instead the new testament encourages cheerful voluntary generosity not compulsory giving the book also critiques troubling financial practices still prevalent in many churches today particularly within charismatic circles it closes with reflection questions intended to spark thoughtful reform in both individual and institutional approaches to giving written from a nigerian perspective the book addresses issues that resonate across the global charismatic movement it invites readers to reconsider long held assumptions about tithing and to embrace a biblically sound grace driven model of ministerial stewardship and generosity in the church
